Dhaka's Volatile Again

Hasina has been great for Indo-Bangla ties but New Delhi needs political relationships beyond her

Continuing the positive momentum in India-Bangladesh ties, PM Modi and his Bangladeshi counterpart Sheikh Hasina inaugurated yet another clutch of development projects in Bangladesh, including the Agartala-Akhaura cross-border rail link. This comes alongside the election of Hasina's daughter Saima Wazed as the director of WHO's Southeast Asia Regional Office in New Delhi. Ties between New Delhi and Dhaka have been on a positive trajectory over the last decade. This has been primarily underpinned by Hasina's zero-tolerance policy towards anti-India militant groups operating from Bangladeshi soil.

However, there are some headwinds that New Delhi should take note of. First, as elections – expected in January – approach Bangladesh, the country is again becoming a battleground for external forces. The US has been applying pressure on Dhaka to ensure “free and fair elections”, while China too has been trying to increase its footprint in Bangladesh. This puts India in a tricky spot between an ally and a rival. Second, Bangladesh is facing serious economic woes, with the country's forex dipping to $20 billion, barely enough for three months of imports. Add to this the rising cost of living and inflation touching 9.6% in September.

This is feeding public unrest as seen in the ongoing protest by garment factory workers, demanding a raise in minimum wages. Simultaneously, opposition BNP and its allies have been hitting the streets demanding the next elections be conducted under a neutral caretaker government. Plus, there are allegations against Hasina's government of targeting opposition leaders and workers through enforced disappearances and killings. All of this means that Bangladeshi politics is again becoming unpredictable. Thus, New Delhi would do well to broaden its political engagements in Dhaka. The goal should be to make India-Bangladesh ties politics-proof.
