CASE STUDIES

MODULE - 16

CASE STUDY - 16

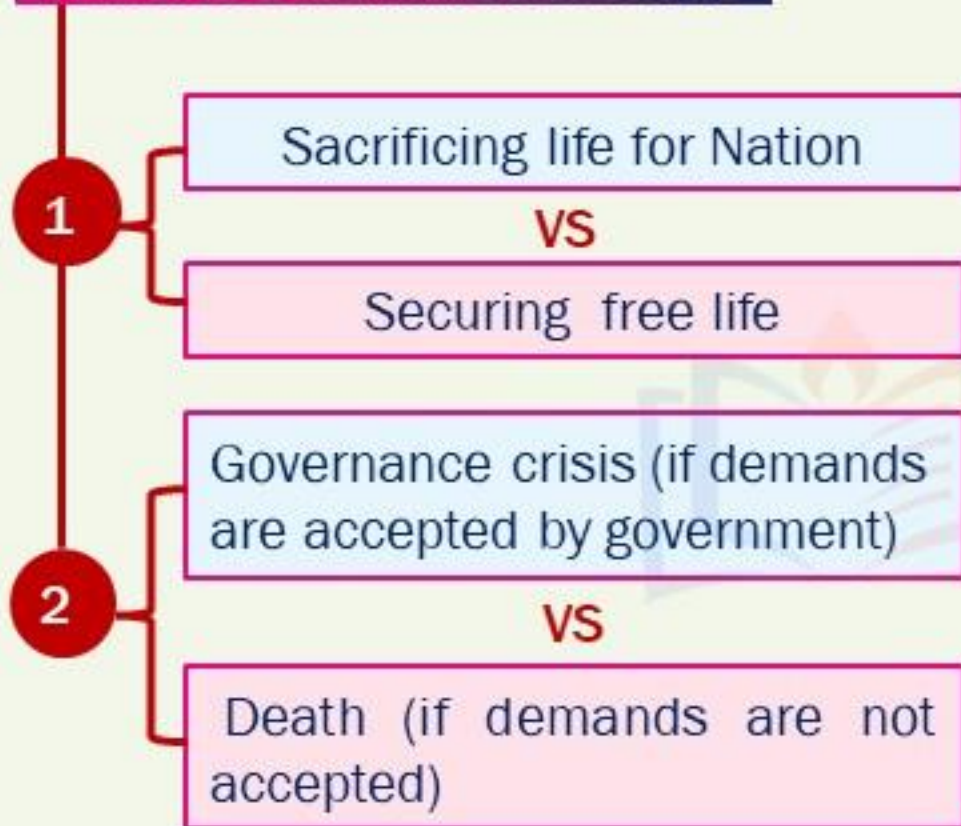

You are a young IAS officer posted as PO – ITDA in a Naxal affected area. You are known for good work done in your previous postings and have won laurels in improving governance and bringing it to the common people. You are known to believe in development and dialogue and always go a step further in proactively meeting the tribes to understand and try to alleviate their sufferings. Despite having armed protection, you were kidnapped by the Naxal, who put forth several demands, including the release of arrested top Naxal leaders, to the government or would behead you. After the government had summarily dismissed their demands, the frustrated Naxal commander gave you an ultimatum to either denounce the government policies and resign or face the prospect of losing your life.

How would you act in this situation? Would you sacrifice your life for the nation or be selfish in saving your own life by resigning from the service? Discuss the measures to tackle the Naxal violence. (250 words)

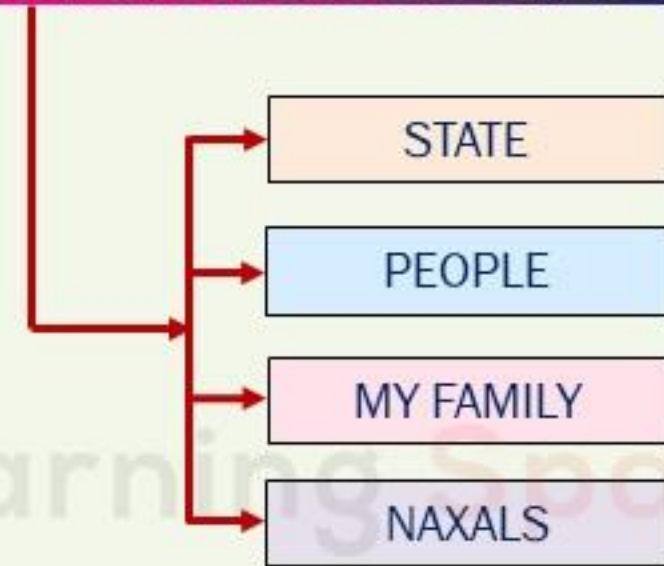

CASE STUDIES

ETHICAL DILEMMA INVOLVED

STAKEHOLDERS INVOLVED

CASE STUDIES

As the kidnapped officer, I will act in the following way:

1. Try to have more dialogue with the Naxal commander to know their issues and persuade, if possible, to bring the situation to normalcy.
2. If dialogue is inconclusive, I will resign and walk free because patriotism lies in serving the nation through various means, not just being an IAS officer.

Sacrificing life is not the right decision because:

- Brings pressure and bad name to the government. As an employee, I can prevent governance crisis by resigning
- Can serve the nation with all my capacities through other means to ensure more people Welfare measures
- Damage is minimized
- Responsibility towards my family is also secured
- Win-win situation for both nation and myself
- Having more persuading dialogue can sometimes turn the tables
